There are a few typographical errors in the book, but they are relatively incidental. More consequential errors are listed by chapter below.

Introduction: There are a couple of references to the "secretary of state of India." These should read: "Secretary of State for India."

Chapter One: On page 48, there is a reference to "bachelors' balls." The implicit claim here seems to be that these were places where bachelors socialized alone. But bachelors' balls in Victorian Britain were places where eligible bachelors could meet the families of those they might marry. Certainly not evidence of men keeping "a distance from married life."

Chapter Two: On page 59, I claim that Henry Winship signed a contract with the EIRC in 1849. This claim comes from a misreading of an apprenticeship document contained in Winship's scrapbook. He must have joined the EIRC later than 1849, but I do not know when his career at the company began. There is also an implicit claim in the section on the scrapbook that Henry Winship wrote "Father" above a photograph where he is seated with three other railway workers. I've come to think that this "Father" may actually have been written by one of Winship's descendants, though graphological evidence seems – to my untrained eye – inconclusive.
